

Historic Building Appraisal
Holy Family Chapel
Chek Keng, Tai Po, N.T.

The Holy Family Chapel (聖家小堂) in Chek Keng (赤徑) was under the charge of the Italian Missionary Society. It was built in 1874 to replace an earlier chapel that had been severely damaged by a storm in 1867. The whole village was finally converted into Catholics. Most of the newborn babies were baptised and had their Confirmation when they were in their teens.

Historical Interest

The chapel was used as a guerrilla base of the famous Hong Kong-Kowloon Independent Battalion of East River Guerrilla (東江縱隊港九獨立大隊) during the Japanese Occupation (1941-1945). When the Japanese invaded Hong Kong, two groups of soldiers from the Guangdong People's Anti-Japanese Guerrilla Force (廣東人民抗日游擊總隊) crossed the boundary and stationed at Wu Kau Tang (烏蛟騰) and Sai Kung respectively.

The chapel itself consists of a chapel and a quarters for the priest. It adjoins an abandoned school named Ming Sun School (銘新學校) which probably already existed in the mid-1920s. The chapel acted as the mission centre for the Tai Long District (大浪堂區); but since 1980 its leading position was replaced by the Immaculate Heart of Mary Parish (聖母無玷之心堂區) in Tai Po. Priests served the villagers of Chek Keng twice a year until 1989. Since then, the chapel was turned into a youth camp, and is now left vacant.

The chapel is a simple single-storey pitched roof building with a two-storey section in the middle housing the priest's quarters. The main hall of the chapel has white painted rendered walls, arched windows, arched cross walls internally, and a decorative altar at one end opposite the main entrance. The floor is cement screeded, the walls are white-washed and all seats or pews removed. A doorway at one side of the altar leads into the priest's quarters and sacristy which are reached by wooden stairs. The school annex at the end appears to be semi-derelict and covered with vegetation. An additional structure providing kitchen and lavatory accommodation has been built on at this end. There are arched windows and cross-walls and moulded cornice at eaves level.

Architectural Merit

There are other mission churches of similar design in the New Territories, so this one is not particularly rare, but it has built heritage value. Part of the roof has been replaced by corrugated steel sheeting and some windows have been replaced by modern aluminium units. Fortunately, the altar aedicule is

*Rarity,
Built Heritage Value & Authenticity*

well preserved.

The chapel marks the endeavours of Catholic missionaries and their influence on village development in Tai Po from the nineteenth century to the early twentieth century. The social value to the community lies in the role the chapel played in the religious lives of the converts. Since the 1960s, the villagers of Chek Keng have either emigrated abroad or moved out to the urban area. In the 1990s, only three villagers resided in Chek Keng. It was then converted into a youth camp. It is now of interest to historians and weekend visitors using the MacLehose Trail.

Social Value & Local Interest

There are no other graded historic buildings near the chapel.

Group Value